The University of Seville is hosting this event focused on the European debate about the role of sport in social inclusion. The event's central theme will be the official presentation of the In-Squads project, an ambitious initiative that seeks to promote social inclusion and the development of life skills through playing football.

The event will feature prominent figures from the sports, institutional, and academic spheres, who will offer a multidisciplinary perspective on the future of sports policy. Confirmed speakers include José Miguel Monje, Pedro Curtido Naranjo, José Antonio Montero Botans, and David Moscoso Sánchez.

The conference is conceived as a key space for the exchange of knowledge and experiences, bringing together the partners of the In-Squads project, those responsible for social inclusion policies, researchers, students of Physical Activity and Sports Sciences, Social Work and Psychology, coaches and professionals in the sports field, as well as any citizen interested in the role of sport as a tool for active citizenship.

This event represents a unique opportunity to analyze how sports practices can become vectors of effective social change in the current European context.
